Penal Law: Are laws written to maintain social order?

“Civil Law & its Obligations 129: THE OBLIGATION OF CIVIL LAWS. “There is no possibility of doubting that Christians are obliged to observe civil laws even though they are made by pagans rulers, provided that they are not opposed to Christian religion or to the moral teaching of the Gospel; and the Apostle himself has left no room for doubt when without making any distinction between lawful superiors he says: ‘Every soul must be submissive to its lawful superiors; authority comes from God only...’ From this most evident statement it is clear that those in the highest authority in civil government can make laws for their subjects which are binding in conscience. This is also suggested by the need of public safety, that is to say, of warding off from civil society the monster of anarchy which is worse than any dog or serpent; and there are also the outstanding examples of the early Christians who obeyed the laws of their pagan rulers so long as they were able to do so without injury to their faith and good morals.” Thus writes the sacred congregation for the propagation of the Faith in its Instruction to the Vicar Apostolic of Siam in answer to his query whether the civil law prohibiting traffic in opium was binding in conscience. Accordingly, the opinion proposed that all modern civil laws are purely penal laws is utterly false. The following rules may be used to determine the nature of the obligation attached to such laws:”
