Moral Theology of the Church: Article 9 Civil Law and its Obligations

“130: First Rule. “Civil laws which determine rights or transfer ownership normally oblige in conscience on the basis of commutative justice. Such laws are just determinations of Natural law, and their non-observance would injure the welfare of society and prevent the citizens from living in peace with each other. Thus, for example, civil laws which grant the use and enjoyment of property belonging to minors, or which set aside a legitimate part of an inheritance for children oblige in conscience.

Second Rule. Civil laws which render acts invalid oblige in conscience after judicial sentence.

This is by far the more probable opinion. Consequently if a judge has declared some will which was not drawn up in the proper form, it must be held invalid in the sphere of conscience also (cf. c. 1513)

Third Rule. When in doubt concerning the moral obligation of a civil law the citizens do not directly commit any sin by acting contrary to that law.

Fourth Rule. Unless there is an evident transgression of Natural, divine, or ecclesiastical law the citizens can always follow in conscience the precepts of the civil law. This is self-evident.”
